In the Name of the People, we Op-pose Repudiation.

If the STATESMAN does not stand by the Platform adopted by the Democracy of Onio in State Convention on the 8th of January, 1868, and by the Financial policy of Hon. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, and by the teachings of Thomas Jefferson, it cer-tainly would have been easy for the Crisis to have quoted them to its confusion. This would have been infinitely better than to have quoted John ADAMS in favor of Repudiation. Because he advocated it is no dihood to speak disrespectfully of him as President of the United States, which disgraced his Administrational We raised no issue with the Crisis touching the payment of the Continental currency. We have stated explicitly that, by reason of the inability of the Continental Congress to raise money under the power conferred upon it by the Articles of Conferred upon it by the Articles of Conferred. federation, the Continental currency un derwent such depreciation as to cause the Continental Congress to devise a scheme for its funding at forty to one, and that then it dropped out of circulation. That portion of it huns funded, and that portion of it funded under a law of the Federal Congress at one hundred for one, with the foreign debt and the domestic debt, inclu-

"By the middle of the year 1780, the Continental currency, estimated at $200,000,000, ceased to be of any value, and sold as an article of speculation at the rate of one dollar in silver for 500 or 1,000 in letterency. Samuel Beck, in his Historical Sketch of Paper Money, says that the annihilation of the value, the repudiation if you choose, of the currency was so complete, that barber shops were papered in jest with the idlis; and the sailors returning from sea were paid off in bundles of this wordliess money, had saits of clothes made of the and turned their loss into a frolic by paracing the streets in decayed finery, which in its better days, had passed for thousands of dollars. A great clamor was raised about them from seper-

We commend this extract to the reconsideration of the Crisis. It was not the debt that was drawing interest that was repudiated. It was that part of the debt that was put into the form of currency, d signed to pass as money. The Government could not prevent its depreciation at the time. They had no money and could raise none, and there was no apparent prospect that they could raise any soon. This caused its depreciation. There is one thing our historical neighbor does not clearly statewhat was the effect upon the country, upon the army, upon the farmers, upon the merchants, upon the mechanics, and upon the laborers—by reason of the depreciation of the continental currency into utter worthlessness? Furthermore, it is the only thing in circulation that goes by the name of money, and it is admitted by the strentions advocates of the resumption of specie payment, that such is the disproportion of col in the country, that resumption, whether it be immediate or a year or two hence, will operate disastrously upon all industrial pursuits. This Currency is part and parcel of the public debt. The Greenbacks and the Fractional Currency are non-interest bearing, and the National Bank Notes are issued on National Bonds that are interes

Now, Repudiation, such as the Crists advocates, will render this Corrency as worth-less as was the Continental Currency when "barber shops were papered in jest with the bills; and the sailors returning from sea were paid off in bunkles of this worthless money," and "bad suits of clothes made of it, and turned their loss into decayed finery, which, in its better day, a troid by parading through the streets in

To pass from the Revolutionary period down to the present time, we want to know what effect Repudiation would have upon our currency and consequently upon the great mass of the people. We have twice asked for a clear statement of its effect; but instead of undertaking to give it, the Crisis has taken up its space by talking about matters not germane to the question In its quotation from "SAMURE BECK's Historical Sketch of Paper Money," it unia tentionally gives a glimpse of the magnificent times that are in store for our people, if its Repudiation doctrine shall prevail in the
